

Relationship between Political Science and Public Administration.

Or/

Political Science and Public Administration as Interdisciplinary approach/study/subject.

Imagine a political system as a grand orchestra, with each instrument playing a crucial role in creating harmonious music. Political science is like the conductor, understanding the overall composition and guiding each section to contribute their unique melodies. Public administration, on the other hand, is like the musicians themselves, translating the conductor's instructions into tangible sounds.

Political science provides the theoretical framework and understanding of how political systems function, examining concepts like power, authority, and governance. It delves into the processes of policymaking, examining how governments make decisions that impact society. Public administration, in turn, takes these policies and translates them into concrete actions, implementing them through various government agencies and programs.

Think of a new environmental regulation as an example. Political science would analyze the political landscape, understanding the different perspectives on environmental protection and the power dynamics involved in policymaking. Public administration, on the other hand, would develop the implementation strategies, creating guidelines, allocating resources, and ensuring the effective enforcement of the regulation.

While political science focuses on the 'what' and 'why' of politics, public administration concentrates on the 'how.' They are interconnected, with political science providing the foundation and public administration putting it into practice. Just as the conductor needs the musicians to bring the music to life, political science needs public administration to translate its insights into tangible outcomes.

-----